TODAY'S COMPOSERS

OTTO JOACHIM left Germany for political reasons and after time spent in Singapore, Shanghai and Brazil, moved to Canada, becoming principal viola with the Orchestre symphonique de Montréal. He started his own electronic music studio in 1956 and divided his time between recording, performing, composition, electroacoustics and the construction of replicas of early music instruments. He remains active as a composer, is becoming known for his paintings, is an associate of the Canadian Music Centre (CMC), and an Honorary Member of the Canadian Electroacoustic Community (CEC).

GUSTAV CIAMAGA has been active in various aspects of electroacoustic music since the late 50's. In addition to composing with electronic means, he has written and lectured extensively on the technology and pedagogy of this genre. His most recent electroacoustic works draw upon microcomputer technology as an aid to composition and sound synthesis. Ciamaga is a teaching member of the Theory and Composition Division, Faculty of Music, University of Toronto. He is an Honorary Member of the Canadian Electroacoustic Community (CEC).

JOHN DUESENBERY studied composition with Robert Stern, Joyce Mekeel, Allan Schindler, and John Goodman. He also studied electronic music at the BEEP Workshop and at the affectionately-remembered Boston School of Electronic Music. He served for a time as instructor and later Director at BSEM, later pursuing studies in computer music at MIT. At present, Duesenberry is employed as a software engineer, and teaches and composes electronic music in his home studio. It was in this studio that he produced Projectile, Tracers, as well as 2:23, which was named winner in the 1986 League/ISCM New England Composers Competition.

Duesenberry's other awards include an Artists Fellowship from the Artists Foundation. He has authored technical articles in publications such as Computer Music Journal and Polyphony. His compositions have been performed in the U.S., Europe, and Australia. An album of his electronic/computer music has been released on the Opus One label.
